The Post Office Stand is a store facade that encourages dramatic social play. The unit can be installed by itself or placed in a community of similar pretend playhouses if you're looking to create an entire area for group imagination. The stand's designed with charming little touches that magnify the feeling of being inside an actual post office. The sign on the front clearly states the number of packages available along with their current prices. There's even two mail slots that kiddos can use to drop off their letters: an "In-Town" and an "Out-of-Town". Including dramatic acting stations like this appealing Post Office Stand brings some welcome diversity to a play area that otherwise consists only of swings or climbers. These spots prompt youth to engage in mental invention and help their brains consider hypothetical situations, both of which will help kids later when they advance to higher grades.
